

I don't know my ages from when these photos were taken, nor even remember the settings of where they were taken, but it is apparent that there is a difference. The thing that I notice as a sign of growth is the less infant-like face in the second picture. Clothing is less like it was made for a baby but for a young child. The first image has my hands making fists, reflex close to newborns. The hands in the first image are plump, a feature most babies have.
